The Idaho Meth Project is in its second year and is working harder than ever to fight meth use in Idaho.

An extraordinary amount of money was raised today for the Idaho Meth Project. Many in Eastern Idaho are showing big support for the cause.

Launched in 2008, the Idaho Meth Project combines extensive research with a proven, hard-hitting media campaign.

Governor Otter: "The dangers of meth were totally out of reality. And when we started explaining, 'Yeah, you'll lose weight but you'll also lose your hair, and your teeth, and your family...and your life.' And we've changed dramatically the perception of meth in Idaho as a result of that."

Today, golfers joined in with the hard hitting, raising funds for the campaign that's making a major impact fighting meth use in Idaho.

Megan Ronk, Executive Director of Idaho Meth Project: "Idaho Falls has probably come out with the largest show of financial support for the project to date. This community should be really proud of all of their efforts in making the Idaho Meth Project a reality in Idaho."

Governor Butch Otter: "People enjoy playing golf. They enjoy the camaraderie and the socialization. But they also know the importance of unselling meth, and that is what they're contributions are going towards."

Megan Ronk, Executive Director of Idaho's Meth Project: "You know, this is our family, this is our community, and it is going to take all of us working together to make a difference."

The event was planned by Kathy Simpson, wife of U.S. Congressman Mike Simpson.
